

Use your knowledge and understanding from across the psychology course to explain how far you agree with the following statement:

"Psychological research has many issues with validity"

In your answer, you should refer to Piaget (1952) study into conservation of number, and at least one other study from another area of psychology

Validity is a measure of how true or accurate something is. There are many different types of validity including internal, external, population, ecological and population validity.

Piaget's study into the conservation of number was a cross-sectional, natural experiment. It used an independent measures design. Each condition of the experiment had children of different ages as this was the IV. An unknown number of Swiss pupils from primary schools took part in the experiment and individually, they were shown two identical rows of 5 counters each, directly lined up, they were then asked if there was the same amount of counters in each row after one row was spread out to look shorter or longer. When they were asked the same question, children at the end of the pre-operational stage (3-6 years) tended to recognise the number of counters had stayed the same in the spread out row but could not really justify the logic of it. Children in the concrete operational stage were able to recognise that both rows still had the same number of counters and could also explain the logic behind it – they were able to conserve.

A weakness of the study is that it had low ecological validity. This is because the task had very little bearing to real life as one of the rows of counters was purposely spread out in front of the child before they were then asked the same question again. If the task had made sense to them, maybe they would have understood it better.

Another weakness is the low internal validity. The experimenter asked the same question twice. For younger children, this could signify their previous answer was incorrect causing them to change their answers, making their answers less truthful. Also, for older children, this may mean that they understood the aim of the study, leading to demand characteristics which would also affect the validity of the results.

The study also had low construct validity as the participants may be able to understand conservation in another way, rather than using counters so it could've been tested in another way such as liquid in different sized glasses which may be a more valid method of measuring conservation.

Another study with issues regarding validity is Cooper and Mackie's. They used a laboratory experiment with the aim to see whether playing violent video games would lead to violent behaviour. It was a repeated measures design as participants played a violent video game, a non-violent video game or a paper-and-pen maze game. The dependent variable was aggression levels displayed by the children after playing the game. Participants in the aggressive game condition spent more time playing with the aggressive toy than participants who played one of the other two games. This was truer of girls than boys.

A weakness of the study is that it lacked ecological validity. In real life, participants would not have been required to play a video game whilst being observed in an artificial environment. They are typically played in a living room or gaming arcade. This could lead to the results being artificial and not reflective of real life.

Overall, I strongly agree with the statement. This is because natural experiments such as Piaget's have issues with internal validity as you cannot control extraneous variables. Equally, lab experiments have issues with ecological validity due to their artificial nature. However, there are other studies which show high validity. For example case studies such as Clive Wearing and Wollman are rich in detail (qualitative data). They are also naturally occurring instances which mean there are less issues with validity.
