LIFE IN A DESERT ECOSYSTEM

A desert may look empty at first, but it is full of life that has learned to survive in extreme conditions. The community of living and nonliving things that interact in a desert is often made up of less than ten inches of rain. Nights can become surprisingly cold, and the sun can be a scorching thing in the ecosystem.

Plants in the desert are producers that make their own food. Some plants store water in their stems, and others have deep roots for escaping. Their roots often go down to the water table.

Animals in the desert have adapted to survive. Many animals rest during the hottest hours of the day and come out at night when temperatures drop. This behavior helps them survive in the desert.

HOW ANIMALS SURVIVE THE HEAT

When I first visited the desert with my science class, I wondered how any animal could live in such intense heat. Our guide, Mr. Lopez, explained that desert animals survive because they use special adaptations. These adaptations help them stay cool, find food, and avoid danger.

One of the first animals we saw was the fennec fox. It has very large ears that release heat from its body. The ears also help it hear insects and small animals that hide under the sand. The fox rests in a shaded burrow during the day and comes out at night when temperatures drop. This behavior helps it survive in the desert.

During the hottest hours of the day, the fox stays in its burrow.

While on the trail, we spotted a lizard resting on a rock. Mr. Lopez explained that reptiles use the environment to warm up or cool down. The lizard basks in the morning to heat its body and later hide in the shade. This behavior is an example of a behavioral adaptation.
