Density and Buoyancy

Recalling: Passage
Read the following carefully before answering the questions that follow.
Buoyancy is a measure of how much mass is contained in a given volume of a substance. It is calculated by dividing the mass of an object by the mass of an equal volume of water. If an object has a greater density than water, it will sink. If an object has a lower density than water, it will float. Buoyancy is the upward force that a liquid exerts on an object that is partially or completely submerged in it. Buoyancy is determined by the density of the liquid and the density of the object.
The buoyant force depends on the object submerged in a fluid depends on the fluid's density and the volume of fluid displaced by the object. The principle known as Archimedes' principle, indicates why objects made of iron sink, although iron is much denser than water, the unique ability of water to displace a large volume of water causing enough buoyant force to float it. Density, has an important relationship with buoyancy. An object that is denser than water will sink faster than the object made of a substance that is denser than water but has a higher density.
Individuals are also responsible for many related phenomena. For instance, the float on water that has a lower density than liquid water. This allows people to float on water because the density of water is lower than the density of the human body. However, the density of water is higher than the density of oil, so oil floats on water. Oil is lighter than water, so it has a lower density. Oil is lighter than water, so it has a lower density. Oil is lighter than water, so it has a lower density.
