

Amazon Rainforest

The Amazon rainforest is the largest tropical rainforest in the world. It is so vital for absorbing carbon dioxide that some people call it 'the lungs of the planet'.

Location

The lush, green, tropical forest covers a huge area of South America. It is one of many habitats in the Amazon rain forest. About 60% of the rainforest is in Brazil, with the remaining forest spread between eight other countries.

Biodiversity

The Amazon rainforest is home to roughly 10% of the world's known species of plants and animals. Many only live in this area and many are endangered.

- Jaguars are the largest cats in North and South America. They are excellent swimmers and hunters with jaws strong enough to bite through a turtle shell.
- Many eagles are also known as royal hawks. These powerful predators are large enough to hunt mammals like sloths and anteaters.
- Other animals include black spider monkeys, poison dart frogs, pink river dolphins and anaconda bags.

Threats

Deforestation is a big problem for the Amazon. Areas of rainforest are being chopped down for logging and to create farmland. Many people are worried that if this continues, the rainforest will not be able to recover.

Endangered Animals

Millions of people live in communities in the rainforest.

Protecting Action

Governments, organisations and individuals are working to protect the rainforest and its inhabitants. They try to stop illegal logging and promote sustainable farming. Many groups recruit trees and people donate money, time and expertise to protect endangered species.
