

ENGINE LUBRICATION

A conventional 2-stroke engine cannot survive its entire lubrication from an oil supply in the crankcase. Oil uptake in the crankcase would be carried into the cylinder with the air/fuel charge, resulting in high oil consumption and spark plug fouling. These drawbacks are the following method for engine lubrication.

Fuel/Oil Mixtures

In this system, lubricating oil is mixed with the fuel. The oil is then carried to the piston and cylinder with the fuel mixture as it is drawn into the engine. This system has the following disadvantages. Since sufficient oil must be mixed with the fuel to meet the maximum lubrication requirements of the engine, the engine will require excess oil when lubrication requirements are minimal, such as at idling.

The only fuels recommended for outboard, 2-stroke marine use are marine, automotive white, and aircraft gasoline at 50:1 octane or greater. The engine is extremely sensitive to changes in fuel gasoline types. Optimum performance can only be realized through consistency.

Never use any more fuel/oil mix in the fuel than a 50:1 ratio of gas to oil. Too little oil results in insufficient lubrication, scoring of cylinder walls, overheating, and eventual destruction. Too much oil results in plug fouling, smoking, carburetor building and poor performance.

CAUTION

Never use oil which has deteriorated. If the lubricants are heavily discolored, metallic particles which may indicate oil deterioration and cause over-heating and poor lubrication. Never use oil above or "boiling."

Never use gasoline which has been stored for great periods of time. It contains substances which will turn to gunk if stored too long. These deposits can cause carburetor problems and spark plug deterioration.

Always drain the fuel tank and carburetor if the engine is no longer used.

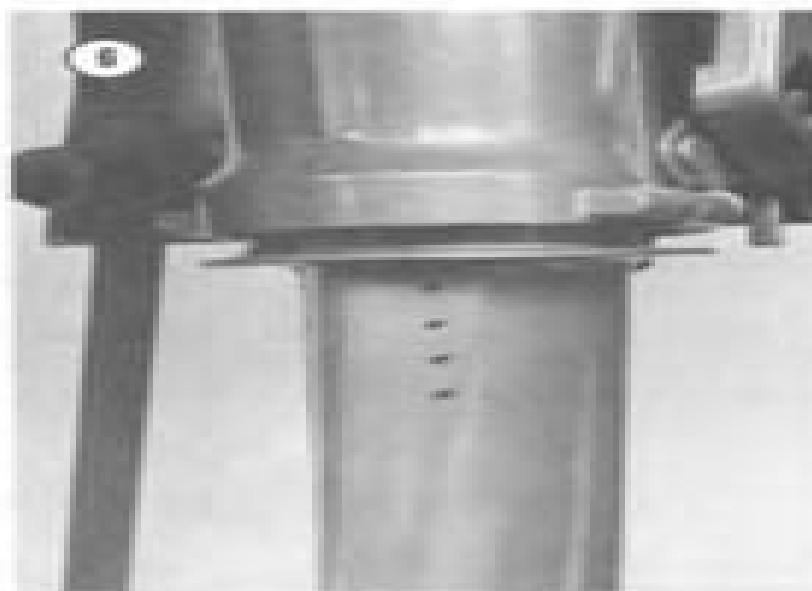

Don't be alarmed if the engine smokes excessively after having been stored for a few weeks, or even days, or after filling the tank:

with fresh gas/oil. The oil tends to settle out of the gas or will remain on the bottom of the tank if not mixed properly. This could cause problems since, as the fuel is used, the mixture will "lean out" and not lubricate as well as it should. Drain the tank into a suitable container and discard oil which remains at the bottom.

WATER PUMP/COOLING SYSTEM

These engines rely on a variable volume pump, in some instances, a thermostatic controlled and reduce engine heat. The system works in much the same as that of an automobile and should be treated with the same respect of being engine life is expected.

Proper functioning can be determined if a steady flow of water discharges from the lower half bodies after the water has cooled the engine is idling. See Figure 46. If there isn't any flow, stop the engine immediately and check for the problem. Don't restart the engine until the situation is rectified or permanent damage will result. Check and clean the discharge bodies with a fine stream of water.
