- the following are the most common types of in vitro assays used to study the effects of drugs on cellular processes:
- 1. Cell Viability Assays: These assays measure the ability of cells to survive and proliferate in the presence of a drug. Common methods include the MTT assay, which measures the reduction of a tetrazolium salt by cellular dehydrogenases, and the 3H -thymidine incorporation assay, which measures the uptake of a radioactive precursor into DNA.
 - 2. Enzyme Assays: These assays measure the activity of specific enzymes, which are often involved in cellular metabolism and signaling pathways. For example, the activity of 3H -labeled substrates can be measured using scintillation counters.
 - 3. Receptor Binding Assays: These assays measure the binding of a drug to a specific receptor, which is often a protein embedded in a cell membrane. The binding of a drug to a receptor can be measured using radiolabeled ligands and techniques such as Scatchard analysis.
 - 4. Gene Expression Assays: These assays measure the expression of specific genes, which can be affected by drugs. Common methods include Northern blotting, which measures the levels of specific mRNA molecules, and RT-PCR, which amplifies specific DNA sequences.
 - 5. Apoptosis Assays: These assays measure the process of programmed cell death, which is often induced by drugs. Common methods include the measurement of DNA fragmentation, which is a hallmark of apoptosis, and the measurement of the release of cytochrome c from mitochondria.
- These assays provide valuable information about the effects of drugs on cellular processes and are essential tools for drug discovery and development.
