Text 1

[1] How does a book go from a document on a computer to the shelves of bookshops around the world? You might imagine a simple story where an author sends their manuscript to a publisher and then that publisher sells it to shops who sell it to readers, but it's not nearly that simple. Instead, publishers sell the rights to books to distributors and other publishers. Publishers also seek out the best books of other publishers and then try to obtain the rights to sell them in their local area. All told, teams of editors, marketers, lawyers, accountants, software providers, and more must collaborate. To make all this easier, an institution exists that is nearly as old as printed books themselves: the book fair.
