These research interests have led to the development of a number of new methods for studying the behaviour of the nervous system. These include the use of microelectrodes to record the activity of single neurons, the use of radioisotopes to label specific neural components, and the use of computer analysis to process the data collected. A number of new techniques have been developed to study the nervous system, including the use of microdissection to remove specific brain regions, and the use of electron microscopy to study the ultrastructure of the nervous system. These new techniques have led to a better understanding of the nervous system, and have also provided new insights into the development and function of the nervous system.
