OVERVIEW

Compare and Contrast the size of planet Earth to the size of the solar system and Milky Way galaxy

VOCABULARY

- ★ Angular Measure
- ★ Triangulation
- ★ Parallax

Notes

The universe is the totality of space, time, matter, and energy. Astronomy is the study of the universe and scales that are used to measure it are very large. Distances are measured using geometry. Triangulation, parallax, and angular measure are examples of this. These calculations are done by converting baselines and parallaxes into distances, or by converting angular diameter and distance into size.

Triangulation: process of determining location of a point by forming triangles to the known points. Astronomers use trigonometry.

Parallax: the observed displacement of an object caused by the change of the observer's point of view. It's done by using an imaginary triangle extended from Earth to a nearby object in space.

Angular measure: knowing the distance of an object can determine many other properties. For example, by measuring the object's angular diameter (the angle from one side of the object to the other as we view it from the sky) we can compute its size.
