Earth Science 11: Astronomy Review Package

1. Draw out a spiral, elliptical, and irregular galaxy.

- a) Which type of galaxy has the most consistent distribution of stars?

Elliptical galaxies.

- b) Which type of galaxy has the most differentiated distribution of stars/structures?

Spiral galaxies.

- i) Name the differentiated structures of this galaxy. Compare these structures in terms of the age of their stars and their proportions of gas and dust.

Spiral galaxies have a central nucleus, which contains many stars and very little gas/dust. Surrounding the nucleus are spiral arms that contain more gas and dust and very few stars. The stars located in the nucleus are older, whereas the stars located in the arms are younger.

2. Observe the two images on the right. The top image is a model diagram of what the Milky Way galaxy might look like from a side-angle. The bottom image is a real photo taken from Earth of the rest of the Milky Way galaxy.

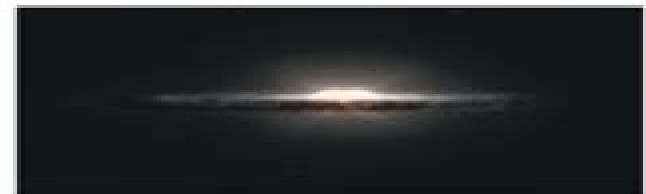

- a) What type of galaxy is the Milky Way?

Spiral.

- b) What observations and other clues did astronomers use to make the conclusion you stated in a)?

By observing the Milky Way from the night sky on Earth, astronomers observed a dark "stripe" running across the rest of the stars and light. This dark stripe is formed by the spiral arms running in front of the bright central nucleus in our galaxy. Because spiral arms have less stars, they do not emit as much light, and they also have more gas and dust which blocks out the light being emitted from the nucleus. This shows that Earth and our solar system is not in the center of our galaxy, but on the outskirts where the spiral arms can still obstruct our view.

If the Milky Way was an elliptical galaxy, we would expect to see a very even distribution of stars across the night sky instead of a dark band running across a bright patch. If the Milky Way was an irregular galaxy, there would not be a striking and predictable dark stripe running across the night sky.
