During the twentieth century, however, the situation changed. In addition to the traditional role of maintaining the power and the physical security of countries, the UN began to represent a new role in maintaining and improving the welfare of entire nations and their populations. In the mid-1940s, the UN began the task of the early reconstruction of Europe, which included building back the economy, re-establishing the currency, and the working of the legal system. In the 1950s, the UN helped to establish the European Economic Community, which later became the European Union. This was followed by the UN's role in the Korean War, the Cuban Missile Crisis, and the Vietnam War. The UN also played a role in the Cold War, particularly in the 1970s and 1980s, when it helped to maintain peace and stability in Europe and the rest of the world. It was during this period that the UN became a major player in world politics.

Consequently, more and more young students experience real difficulties when choosing their major, including uncertainty about what subjects are most interesting, what subjects students prefer, what subjects are most promising for their future, and what subjects are most useful for their professional goals. These difficulties are often compounded by the reality that there is little guidance from the educational institutions that are supposed to help students choose the best subjects for their future. This is particularly true of many secondary schools in India.
