Abstract

There are few reported cases in the prostate adenocarcinoma literature with locoregional extension and normal prostate specific antigen (PSA). We present the case of a patient with prostate adenocarcinoma and metastases with PSA values within the normal range, despite evidence of clinical and radiological progression of the disease. This is a 72 year old patient presenting with a dyspareunia syndrome in which there is a budding ulceration of the glands, an induration of the corpora cavernosa and whose rectal examination has objectified a malignant prostate. PSA was assayed at 3.47 ng/ml; prostatic biopsy and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) revealed prostate cancer with extension to the urethral, cavernous and rectal areas. Hormone therapy was instituted and the course after two months was marked by the occurrence of several episodes of anemia treated by blood transfusion.

1. Introduction

Prostate cancer is the most common cancer in male gender. It represents the third leading cause of cancer mortality among men over 50 years in France and Europe. Since 2005, its incidence has been constantly increasing due to a more targeted practice of screening and improvement of diagnostic tools. Early individual diagnosis is based on an assay of the PSA rate associated with digital rectal examination, annually, in men aged from 50 to 75 years with a life expectancy of more than 10 years [1].

However, more recent studies have shown that some men with PSA levels below 4.0 ng/ml have prostate cancer and others with higher levels do not [2]. Although normal PSA values in the presence of prostate cancer are considered rare, in the literature this has been described as occurring in about 20% of cases.
