The emergence of a new generation of writers, however, is symptomatic of the new functionality of the space. "What makes me happy and what interests me and keeps me busy, is not the environment," Frangoulidis writes. "What has changed is my attitude towards it." That statement provides a key to understanding the cultural position the new generation occupies: that the new generation has grown up outside the environment, and that the new generation has grown up without the values that have shaped the culture of the "bourgeoisie" and the "proletariat" (the "bourgeoisie" and the "proletariat" are the two main categories of the new generation, the bourgeoisie being the group of those who have grown up in the city, and the proletariat being the group of those who have grown up in the countryside). The new generation has grown up in a new environment, and that new environment has shaped the new generation. It is not the environment that has shaped the new generation, but the new environment that has shaped the new generation. It is not the environment that has shaped the new generation, but the new environment that has shaped the new generation.
