Any suitable examples, for example:

- the data generated by connected devices is available to many people and organisations who can use it for marketing purposes. For example, the creators of the devices and the apps used to control them will be able to capture data every time the device is used. This data will be available to them and any third party companies they nominate to store and analyse it
- all of the devices are connected to the internet and therefore can be targeted by hackers. Security experts have demonstrated how easy it is to hack these devices by hacking everything from smart fridges to baby monitors and cars and have stated that not enough is being done to build security and privacy into the devices
- data on all users' journeys, whether using their own vehicle, using public transport or as a pedestrian, could be stored and used for other purposes than helping to control traffic flow. Some people argue that this data could be misused by the state and lead to far greater surveillance and control
- it could also be stolen by hackers and sold to organisations who could benefit from it – for example, to target advertisements at people who use particular routes or travel at certain times
- the control systems used for intelligent transport and in the vehicles themselves are vulnerable to hackers who could take over traffic light systems and vehicles
- computer experts have shown how wirelessly controlled traffic lights can be manipulated using a laptop so that they had all green lights on their way to work. They have also shown how easy it is to take over the steering, lights and wipers of internet connected cars.
