This study aimed to identify a device that will support the development of students' reading skills. The device, consisting of a body, supporting mechanism, and reader and page-turning wheels, could assist the reading comprehension, including comprehension and summarization, with paper as a supporting system that will help the users in reading books at the convenience of 24 hours. Involvement students and their teachers. The design process emphasized experimental development method. The efficiency of the proposed mechanical device and its related mechanisms were compared through a comparison experiment using questionnaires. The device was tested for 30 days and was evaluated by 20 respondents, after being designed in the device according to the authors' comments. The results indicated that the 24-hour device could improve during the testing of the device was received. These data were collected to identify how well the device performed. Although it has been revealed that the device has achieved the objectives listed in identifying the device, the 24-hour supporting system will be a significant contribution.
