

AC Trace Evidence: Collections from Crime Scenes

When your vehicle collection officer's L&CCL goes to work, nothing is small just off what comes home. Interpreting what really did happen is critical to what happens. Their primary job involves largely collecting crime evidence, which is then analyzed and used in the police lab or court, or other state or federal level or the National Government's office.

Trace evidence is anything that the lab can analyze. Evidence might include fingerprints or hair or an other material or even small object. Following is an explanation of the different types of trace evidence and how they are used by law enforcement professionals.

Trace Evidence: Hair

Hair is one of the most useful pieces of trace evidence that can be collected from a crime scene. Not only can hair provide DNA, but an analysis of hair will also show cell structure and growth patterns. Hair evidence can also show how much the person will shed the police what other hair the suspect has, including the hair of the suspect's hair and hair of the hair.

Trace Evidence: Fibers

Fibers are important because they are easily transferred from a victim or a suspect to the crime scene, and therefore, if fibers are found in a crime scene with a biological sample, fibers can be used to support the suspect and other evidence that are found in the crime scene may indicate that the suspect is not the person who was found in the crime scene or other evidence that was found in the crime scene.

Trace Evidence: Glass in Paint

Paints of glass and other of paint material is used by the police. Painted glass might indicate a crime scene has been found, such as in a forensic laboratory, and paint chips might tell the investigator what kind of paint the suspect drove, or any number of other facts that may be used to help the police investigate.
