

CHAPTER 10: CELL BIOLOGY

CELL REPRODUCTION

Section 10.1: Cell Division

Most cells pass through a cycle, which repeats again and again. This cycle is called the cell cycle.

The cell cycle is a continuous process that is divided into four phases: prophase, metaphase, anaphase, and telophase. Prophase is the first phase of mitosis. It begins with the condensing and organizing of DNA into two distinct chromosomes that each have two sister chromatids. During the G₁ phase, each chromosome is copied. The two copies of each chromosome, called sister chromatids, stay together in one unit by the centromere. As the time for metaphase and the next two phases approaches, the two pairs of sister chromatids appear near the disappearing nucleolus. The chromosomes form around opposite poles of the cell and spindle fibers collect them at the centromere in preparation for anaphase.

Metaphase is characterized by the chromosomes lining up in the center of the cell. The chromosomes are aligned in the center of the cell.

Anaphase is the phase of the cell cycle in which the sister chromatids separate. The chromosomes move toward opposite poles of the dividing cell. After the chromosomes separate, they are considered to be individual chromosomes.

Telophase is the last phase of mitosis. After the chromosomes reach opposite ends of the cell, the spindle fibers disappear and the chromosomes return to their original state. A nuclear envelope is formed around each set of chromosomes, and a nucleolus forms in each of the newly forming cells.

Most cells spend most of their time in the G₁ phase of the cell cycle. After this time, the cell enters the S phase, which is the phase in which DNA is replicated.

Section 10.2: Prokaryotic Cell Division

In the previous section, the cell cycle was described in terms of mitosis and meiosis. Many other organisms, however, reproduce asexually.
