AND CHEMICALS

Chemical elements are equally classified by their properties into three groups: metals, nonmetals, and metalloids. Most of the known elements are metals. Their physical properties include high thermal and electrical conductivity, high luster, malleability (ability to be pounded flat without shattering), and ductility (ability to be drawn out into a fine wire). All common metals are solids at room temperature except mercury, which is a liquid. The periodic table illustrated in Figure 15.1 shows the classification of the elements.

All elements to the left of the shaded area except hydrogen are metals. Those to the right are nonmetals. Those in the shaded area have intermediate properties and are called semimetals or metalloids. Families or groups of elements consist of elements in vertical columns in the periodic table. Elements within a group or family (called congeners) have similar chemical properties because they have similar valence electronic structures; that is, the number of valence electrons (electrons in the outermost shell) is the same for all members of a family or group. For historical reasons, most of the groups have names, some often referred to by their names. These are the following:

1. Group 1A, called alkali metals because they react with oxygen to form bases
2. Group 2A, called alkaline earth metals because their presence makes soils
3. Group 3A, no common name
4. Group 4A, no common name
