Entrepreneurship is defined as "the process of identifying and exploiting opportunities to create new products, services, or organizations" (Schumpeter, 1934, p. 133). The process of entrepreneurship is often described as a cycle of innovation, growth, and sustainability. The process begins with the identification of a market opportunity, followed by the development of a business plan, the acquisition of resources, and the implementation of the plan. The process then moves to the growth phase, where the business expands its operations and reaches a sustainable state. The process concludes with the sustainability phase, where the business maintains its competitive advantage and continues to grow.
