

What is an accurate and representative population cannot be easily determined. Based on the data from the 1980 Census, the Appalachian Region could exceed 10 million people. These estimates must meet the several definitions of population used. The Census defines population as "the number of people in a place of habitation, including rural and urban areas, and includes all persons who are physically present in the place, as well as those who, though not physically present, have their usual place of residence in that place." This is the definition of "resident population" and does not include "transient population" (i.e., tourists, business travelers, etc.) or "nonresident population" (i.e., students, employees of the federal government, etc.). The Appalachian Region contains approximately 10 million people, but the number of nonresident population is unknown.
