Student Exploration: Deformational Flows

Learning Objectives: Students will be able to explain the difference between brittle and ductile deformation.

Key Concepts: Deformation, brittle deformation, ductile deformation, stress, strain, fault, fold, magma, metamorphism, plate tectonics.

Stress is a force per unit area. It is the internal force that causes deformation. Stress can be compressional, tensional, or shear.

Strain is the change in shape or volume of a rock in response to stress. It can be elastic, plastic, or brittle.

Brittle deformation occurs when a rock is stressed beyond its elastic limit. The rock fractures and breaks into fragments. This is the type of deformation that creates faults and joints.

Ductile deformation occurs when a rock is stressed beyond its elastic limit but does not fracture. The rock deforms permanently and flows. This is the type of deformation that creates folds and magma.

Brittle deformation is more common in the upper crust, where temperatures are low and pressures are high.

Brittle deformation is more common in the upper crust.

Ductile deformation is more common in the lower crust, where temperatures are high and pressures are low. This is the type of deformation that creates folds and magma.

a. Brittle deformation is more common in the upper crust.

b. Ductile deformation is more common in the lower crust.

Brittle deformation is more common in the upper crust.
