What is Conic Sections

A conic section (or simply conic) is a curve formed by the intersection of a plane and a double right circular cone.

Conic Sections and Degenerate Conics

Types of Conics

Parabola- parallel to one and only one generator

Ellipse- not parallel to any generator.

Circle- not parallel to any generator but is perpendicular to the axis.

Hyperbola- parallel to two generators.

Degenerate Conic Sections

The last three cases - point, line, and the two intersecting lines, are obviously not curves but are also possible results of the intersection of the plane and the double right circular cone.

That is why they are not conics, but are referred to as degenerate conic sections.

Degenerate Conic Sections

Point - A point in geometry is a location. It has no size, no width, no length and no depth. A point is shown by a dot.

Line- is defined as a line of points that extends infinitely in two directions.

Two Intersecting Lines- two lines cross each other in a plane.

Point of Intersection- the intersecting lines share a common point.

Different Types of Conic Section

- Ellipse
- Circle
- Hyperbola
- Parabola
