When a steady current is flowing through the potentiometer wire of uniform cross section area, the fall of potential  $V$  along a potentiometer wire is directly proportional to the length of the wire  $l$ , i.e.,  $V \propto l$ .

1. Draw the circuit diagram as shown in Fig. 6 and arrange all the apparatus on the table accordingly.
2. Make the connections as shown in the Fig. 6. Touch the end A of potentiometer wire where positive terminal of battery has been joined as origin (zero) for the purpose of measuring length.
3. Connect the main circuit of voltmeter and ammeter also. Note the zero correction for voltmeter and ammeter.
4. Now insert the key K, and press the slider J at the end B of potentiometer wire and adjust the rheostat so that reading of voltmeter is maximum but well within the scale. In this position note the current I by the ammeter and keep it throughout constant during the experiment. If the current changes during the experiment, adjust the rheostat to maintain the current constant.
5. Slide the slider J along the wire from end A. Note the reading of voltmeter after every 20 to 25 cm. The reading should be taken at a point where the deflection in voltmeter is full division.
