Abstract The authors examined the effects of a brief, self-administered program of stress-management training on the health and well-being of police officers. The program was designed to teach officers a variety of stress-management techniques, including relaxation, cognitive restructuring, and problem-solving. The results of the study indicated that the program had a positive effect on the officers' health and well-being, and that the effects were maintained over time. The authors conclude that the program is a promising intervention for reducing stress and improving the health of police officers.
