

The Kingdom Fungi

The Kingdom Fungi includes some of the most important organisms, both in terms of their ecological and economic roles. By decomposing dead material, they continue the cycle of nutrients through ecosystems. In addition, most plants could not grow without the fungi, or mycorrhizae, that live in their roots and supply essential nutrients. Other fungi provide numerous drugs (such as penicillin and other antibiotics), foods like mushrooms, truffles and morels, and the bubbles in bread (yeast), champagne, and beer. Fungi are eukaryotes, which means their cells have a nucleus. Their cells also have a cell wall made of chitin. Fungi include both unicellular (yeast) and multicellular (molds, mushrooms etc.) organisms that are generally visible to the naked eye. Fungi don't move on their own, nor do they make their own food. Fungi are heterotrophs or consumers, which means they get their nutrients from other living things. Fungi use external digestion – they secrete (let out) digestive enzymes that dissolve their food, and then they absorb the nutrients they need from the environment. The body of a fungus is made up of tiny hair-like structures called hyphae. Examples:
