32.1 Electricity

- What is the natural law of electromagnetism?

This relationship is an important and fundamental law of nature. This relationship links current, voltage, and force. Current represents the number of charges moving in one direction. In contrast, voltage represents the potential difference between two different locations. This means that charges move from higher voltage locations to lower voltage locations, following a path of least resistance.

- Why does the natural law of electromagnetism have two different components: current and voltage? These are important because they can determine the magnitude of charges and potential difference between them. These two factors determine how much energy is transferred. They are not related to each other. Larger currents are, generally speaking, higher voltages, representing different forms of potential energy.

32.2 Electric Circuits

- What parts of a circuit are generally charged, and which part is good for investigating charged?

These questions determine which part of a circuit is charged, because these factors affect how much charge the circuit has.

- Please explain three categories of circuit components: DC voltage and current source, DC voltage and DC current source, and DC voltage and DC current source. These three categories are called open, closed, and short circuits. These three categories are called open, closed, and short circuits. These three categories are called open, closed, and short circuits.

- What are the several components that make up a circuit?
