What This Significantly Means and For What Reason
 A significant correlation found in a study of 1990s-era U.S. adolescents revealed that the more time adolescents spent watching television, the more they were inclined to be obese. The study's authors concluded that the trend occurred because of a number of factors, including the fact that adolescents who watch television are more likely to eat unhealthy foods, such as sugary drinks, and are less likely to exercise. The researchers also noted that the correlation was stronger for adolescents who watched television for more than four hours a day.
