

Exercise 1: The Crab (Decapoda)

1.1 External Morphology

Observe the external morphology of the crab. The crab is a decapod, meaning it has ten legs. The legs are divided into two groups: the walking legs (pereiopods) and the appendages (maxillae, maxilliped, and chelipeds). The walking legs are used for locomotion, while the appendages are used for feeding and other functions. The crab is also covered in a hard exoskeleton, which is made of chitin. The exoskeleton is divided into several segments, including the head, thorax, and abdomen. The head is the anterior end of the crab, and the abdomen is the posterior end. The thorax is the middle section of the body, and it contains the heart and other internal organs. The legs are attached to the thorax. The crab is also covered in a layer of cuticle, which is a thin, waxy substance that helps to prevent water loss.

Observe the

Exoskeleton

1.2 Internal Morphology

Observe the internal morphology of the crab. The internal organs are located in the ventral cavity, which is the space below the exoskeleton. The heart is located in the dorsal part of the ventral cavity, and it pumps blood to the rest of the body. The lungs are located on either side of the heart, and they are used for respiration. The digestive system is located in the anterior part of the ventral cavity, and it is used for breaking down food into smaller pieces that can be absorbed. The reproductive system is located in the posterior part of the ventral cavity, and it is used for producing offspring.
