

Editorial: An Introduction

Recent discussions on the role of culture and environment (including the built environment) in aging have highlighted the importance of the built environment in the lives of older adults. This article is the second in a two-part series that addresses changes in the built environment that may affect the aging process. The first article, published in the last issue, focused on the built environment and aging in rural areas, while this article focuses on urban areas. The built environment and aging have been studied from a variety of perspectives, including the built environment as a source of physical challenges, as well as an area of social and cultural activity. This second article is concerned with the built environment and aging in urban areas, specifically focusing on the built environment as a source of social support and resources for older adults. This article also highlights changes in the built environment and aging in urban areas.

Very few studies have examined the built environment and aging in urban areas. This article is concerned with the built environment and aging in urban areas, specifically focusing on the built environment as a source of social support and resources for older adults.
