There is no comprehensive theory of international migration. Those that exist tend to focus on manual labor migrants and then extend, haphazardly, to the origins and patterns of settlement of professional migrants, entrepreneurs, and refugees. Existing theories can be organized into four categories: (1) determinants of the origins of migration; (2) determinants of its continuation and directionality; (3) uses of migrant labor; and (4) patterns of migrant settlement and adaptation. In this chapter we review and evaluate these theories and note their applicability to the different types of migrant described in the prior chapter.

The Origins of Migration Push-Pull

The most widely held approach to the causes of migration is that of push-pull theories. Generally, these consist of a compilation of economic, social, and political factors deemed to force individuals to leave their native region or country and of a similar list of factors impelling them toward another. This approach is employed mutatis mutandis to explain movements other than physical-labor migrations. Thus, refugee flows are frequently contrasted with labor migrations by noting the greater importance of ~~push~~ factors in the former.<sup>1</sup> Students of professional emigration have compiled polar lists of incentives, often termed differentials of advantage, to explain the causes of the brain drain from certain countries.<sup>2</sup>
