Abstract

Amusement park physics is a popular way to reinforce physics concepts and to motivate physics learners. This article describes a novel physics competition where students use simple tools to take amusement park ride measurements and use the data to answer challenging exam questions. Research into the impact of participating in the competition reveals positive effects such as the acquisition of experimentation skills and improved attitudes towards physics.

Introduction

In British Columbia (BC), Canada over 10 000 students participate annually in an amusement park physics programme held at Playland Amusement Park at the Pacific National Exhibition (PNE) in Vancouver, BC, Canada. The programme, originally developed 21 years ago by a local high school teacher, began as an invitation to high school physics classes to experience and calculate the physics of amusement park rides. It has since expanded to include middle and even elementary school students, each with their own grade level and curriculum-specific programme. In 2006 a new initiative was created, born out of research that was being conducted on students' learning during the event [1, 2]: an amusement park physics competition called BC's Brightest Minds. To compete, pairs of students ride amusement park rides, use simple tools to make measurements and complete challenging questions using their data and observations. This article will describe the goal and unique characteristics of this novel competition and provide evidence from research about its potential for enhancing students' physics learning experiences.

Field trips to investigate the physics of amusement parks have become a popular component of the high school physics learning experience. As early as 1975 an article appeared in The Physics Teacher which detailed the complex physics behind some amusement park rides in order to investigate why some rides are scarier than others [3]. In the piece, Roeder concluded that it is not only the magnitude of the acceleration incurred during a ride, but also the way and rate with which accelerations can change during rides that can affect how scary the rider's experience is. In the mid-1980s several articles were published by instructors about how they were using amusement park physics to enrich their students' understanding of physics. Some used the experience as a laboratory exercise [4], another conducted their course's final exam at the amusement park [5]. Escobar [6] and McGehee [7] wrote generally about the benefits of participating in an amusement park physics programme and provide useful background in both the physics of rides and methods to create a meaningful learning experience from a school field trip to the amusement park. Escobar [6] writes: 'The
