Atmosphere Ocean General Circulation Models The survey is based largely on the responses of 19 climate modellers to several questions and a discussion document circulated in 1995 We interpret the responses in terms of the following factors the implicit assumptions which scientists hold about how the environmental policy process deals with scientific uncertainty over human related global warming the different scientific styles that exist in climate research and the influence of organisations institutions and policy upon research agendas We find evidence that scientists perceptions of the policy process do play a role in shaping their scientific practices In particular many of our respondents expressed a preference for keeping discussion of the issue of flux adjustments within the climate modeling community apparently fearing that climate contrarians would exploit the issue in the public domain While this may be true we point to the risk that such an approach may backfire We also identify assumptions and cultural commitments lying at a deeper level which play at least as important a role as perceptions of the policy process in shaping scientific practices This leads us to identify two groups of scientists pragmatists and purists who have different implicit standards for model adequacy and correspondingly are or are not willing
