Based on this perspective, the findings described in this paper have revealed that, despite the relatively low level of education and low income of the respondents, they are very keen to engage in continuing professional development. The respondents' interest in professional development is not limited to the acquisition of new knowledge and skills, but also includes the development of personal qualities, such as self-confidence, self-esteem and self-respect. These are major motivators of personal development, as they are closely related to the respondents' self-image and self-efficacy. The respondents' interest in professional development is also influenced by the fact that they are engaged in a demanding job, which requires high cognitive and physical skills.
