Abstract The authors examined the effects of a 10-week, 12-session, group-based, self-management program on the self-management skills of 100 African American women with type 2 diabetes. The program was designed to help women learn to manage their diabetes by setting goals, monitoring their blood glucose levels, and making lifestyle changes. The program was evaluated using a pretest-posttest design. Results showed that the program had a positive effect on the self-management skills of the women. The program was found to be effective in improving the self-management skills of the women, and the results suggest that the program should be used as a self-management tool for African American women with type 2 diabetes.

This paper discusses the importance of using a multi-dimensional measure of quality of life, and the importance of using a measure that is valid, reliable, and sensitive to change.
