The discussion regarding the relation of design and research in landscape architecture started somewhat later than in other design disciplines. But the past decade has shown a sharp rise of publications on 'research through/by design(ing)' (RTD). The literature has now reached a level of richness that enables a review of the State of the Art and a differentiation of types of contributions to the discourse. We reviewed more than 200 publications (scientific journal papers, conference papers, PhD theses, MSc theses and others) on RTD in relation to landscape architecture and closely related disciplines. The review shows that a rather small portion of the publications deals with RTD a scholarly sense. The remaining portion of scholarly publications offered a useful base for further scrutiny. We categorised the relevant literature according to types of publications and the epistemological stances taken. Based on this categorisation we identified areas that need further research and thus sketched an agenda for further research on RTD in landscape architecture.

1. Introduction

Landscape architecture has developed from a professional discipline into an academic discipline in the past few years (Benson, 1998; Milburn & Brown, 2003; Milburn, Brown, & Paine, 2001; van den Brink & Bruns, 2014). As designing landscapes and urban environments tackles spatial concerns of various scales and a wide spectrum of issues from the natural and social realm, designing is a very complex activity. Therefore, landscape architecture embraces approaches such as 'evidence based' design. These approaches are based on research results from other disciplines (e.g. ecology or environmental psychology) and offer thorough legitimations of design decisions (Brown & Corry, 2011; Deming & Swaffield, 2011) in site-specific designs. 'Evidence based design' formed the major efforts in research related to landscape architecture for a long time. Most of this research would range under 'research on design' and 'research for design' when categorizing it according to Frayling's (1993) terms. This evidence was mainly produced by other disciplines and was of descriptive nature.
