

Diagram 1: A Content Analysis of a Number of Ethical Judgments

• Non-ideal Conditions

It is common in the theory literature to distinguish, between, 'ideal' and 'non-ideal' conditions. These positions correspond roughly to 'normative' and 'descriptive' approaches.

IDEAL CONDITIONS: These judgments are concerned with the consequences of an action if it were carried out in an idealized, or perfectly-idealized, situation. Typically, they neglect the presence of other agents, other interests, other values, other constraints, or other obstacles that could interfere with the action. The norms that are derived from these settings are:

- A. Non-ideality: means that, given the actual situation, the action cannot possibly be carried out as planned. Hence, it is not possible to act in accordance with the norm that was derived from the ideal setting.
- B. Proper non-idealities: are situations in which the action can be carried out, but only if it is modified in a way that respects the principles of justice. These principles include the principles of respect for persons, non-discrimination, and the principle of equality. Hence, the norm that was derived from the ideal setting can be violated.
- C. Incorrect idealities: are situations that are not fully described by the ideal setting. Hence, the norm that was derived from the ideal setting cannot be violated.
- D. Improper non-idealities: are situations in which the action can be carried out, but only if it is modified in a way that respects the principles of justice. These principles include the principles of respect for persons, non-discrimination, and the principle of equality. Hence, the norm that was derived from the ideal setting can be violated.

NON-IDEAL CONDITIONS: These judgments are concerned with the consequences of an action if it were carried out in a real-life situation, and taking into account the actual constraints and circumstances.

Notes: This diagram is concerned with a number of ethical judgments, and these judgments are concerned with the consequences of an action if it were carried out in a real-life situation, and taking into account the actual constraints and circumstances.
