

In August 2007, California's Superintendent of Public Instruction Jack O'Connell called for greater public attention to the racial achievement gap in education. Highlighting evidence that white and Asian students in California consistently outperform their African American and Latino peers, O'Connell urged a state wide focus on eliminating this gap. Some commentators responded to O'Connell's statement by arguing that the persistent racial gap in achievement scores is a product of cultural differences that must be addressed if the gap is to be closed.¹ This cultural argument suggests that the problem of low test scores resides within the African American and Latino communities; it fails to account for the fact that California students generally have lower test scores than students across the nation. Notably, white students in California also perform well below white students in almost all other states.

In response to O'Connell's call, the 2007 Educational Opportunity Report examines California's poor and unequal educational achievement in light of the conditions in California's public schools. As the latest in a series of reports on educational opportunities in California,² this report uses the most recent state data available to:

- ✱ Document, for every high school, the relationships among California's educational infrastructure, rates of high school completion, and enrollment in the state's public four-year colleges and universities;
- ✱ Examine the educational infrastructure of the state's middle schools;
- ✱ Investigate the opportunities provided in schools serving different racial groups—schools that serve a majority of white and Asian students; schools that serve a majority of African American, Latino, and American Indian students; and schools that are intensely segregated and enroll over ninety percent of African American, Latino, and American Indian students;
- ✱ Analyze the math pipeline through middle school and high school and the flow of students through it—including how well students are being prepared to succeed in high-stakes accountability measures;
- ✱ Show the changes in graduation rates for the Class of 2006, overall and for different groups of high schools.
