Answers to Learning Assessment Questions

Chapter 1

1. The Gram stain needs to be repeated because the E. coli quality control slide gave a false gram-positive reaction. Because of this quality control result, the smear made from the clinical sample could not be accurately interpreted.
2. The most likely cause of the false gram-positive result for E. coli was insufficient decolorization time. Crystal violet, the primary stain, was not removed from the bacterial cells.
3. Pili, made up of pilin protein, aid in bacterial attachment to solid surfaces such as mucous membranes. Flagella, consisting of flagellin protein, are responsible for motility.
4. Capsules help microorganisms resist phagocytosis. Phagocytic cells are less able to bind to the capsular polysaccharide than they are to surface proteins. In addition, capsules hide antigens on the surface of bacteria, preventing them from interacting with antibodies produced by an animal in response to an infection.
5. LPS is also known as endotoxin. This molecule is toxic to animals, inducing nonspecific effects such as fever, inflammation, hypotension, and shock. LPS contains three regions: an antigenic O-specific polysaccharide, a core polysaccharide, and an inner lipid A. The lipid A moiety is responsible for producing fever and shock conditions in patients infected with gram-negative bacteria.
6. c
7. a
8. b
9. Older bacterial cells are decolorized more easily than younger cells, because as cells age their cell walls become "leaky" and allow molecules to pass more readily out of the cell. In the Gram stain, the crystal violet-iodine complex is more readily lost during the decolorization step.
10. Bacterial spores have a thick protein coat that makes them highly resistant to chemical agents, temperature changes, dehydration, ultraviolet and gamma radiation, and desiccation. They are also metabolically inactive and can therefore survive periods of starvation.
11. The three ways in which genetic material may be transferred from one bacterium to another are transformation, transduction, and conjugation. Transformation is the uptake and incorporation of naked or free DNA into a bacterial cell. Transduction is the transfer of bacterial genes by a bacteriophage from one cell to another. Conjugation is the transfer of genetic material from a donor bacterial strain to a recipient strain. Conjugation requires close contact between the two cells.

12. 3' TTACCGACAAC 5'
3' AATGCCCTOTTO 3'
13. Uracil
14. During lysogeny, phage DNA is inserted into the bacterial genome, but virus particles are not produced. When the bacterial cell replicates, the viral genome is copied along with the bacterial chromosome. During the lytic cycle, bacteriophages are produced until the bacterial cell dies and is lysed.

Chapter 2

1. Antimicrobial therapy eliminated her indigenous gastrointestinal tract microbiota, which gave the pathogen Clostridium difficile the opportunity to proliferate and initiate an infectious process.
2. Resident microbiota are organisms that occupy a specific body site for a long time (months to years). Transient biota are those microorganisms that inhabit a site for a short time, or temporarily.
3. The most common contaminants of improperly collected blood cultures are resident skin microbiota, such as Staphylococcus spp., diphtheroids, Micrococcus spp., and Propionibacterium spp.
4. A carrier is a host colonized by a potentially pathogenic organism without causing clinical symptoms in that host.
5. The carrier is a source of infection and can transmit the infecting organism or virus to a susceptible individual.
6. The nutritional status of the site, pH, oxidation-reduction potential, and presence and interference of already established organisms all determine the composition of indigenous biota.
7. c
8. A symbiotic relationship.
9. The resident microbiota helps to: (1) prime the host immune system; (2) produce substances toxic to more pathogenic species; and (3) decrease the numbers of pathogenic organisms by competing for nutrients.
10. Virulence factors produced by Clostridium difficile include toxins A and B. Toxin A acts as an enterotoxin, toxin B acts as a cytotoxin.
11. True pathogens are organisms that cause disease in susceptible hosts a high percentage of the time. An opportunistic pathogen is an organism that can be a member of the indigenous
