(Chapter – 6) (Attitude and Social Cognition) (Important Questions)

(Class – XII)

Question 7:

Explain the concept of prejudice.

Answer 7:

Prejudices are negative attitudes towards a selected group and are supported stereotypes (the cognitive component). The cognitive component of prejudice is in the midst of dislike or hatred (the affective component). Prejudice gets translated into discrimination (the behavioural component) whereby people behave in less positive way towards a specific target group compared to a different group which they favour. In our society there has been cases of discrimination thanks to prejudice supported gender, religion, community, caste, physical handicap and illness like AIDS.

Question 8:

What's halo effect?

Answer 8:

During formation of impression, we've got a bent to think that a target one that has one set of positive qualities must produce other positive qualities. This can be called halo effect. For example, if we are told that someone is 'tidy' and 'punctual', we are likely to think that the person must even be 'hardworking'.

Question 9:

Explain social cognition with the assistance of examples.

Answer 9:

Social cognition refers to all or any those psychological processes that cope with the gathering and processing of data associated with social objects. For example, a teacher's conclusions regarding a student's behavior at school are quite different from his mother's conclusion who observes him reception.

Question 10:

What's schema?

Answer 10:

Schemas that function within the type of categories are called prototypes. They're the complete set of features or qualities that help us to define an object clearly.

Question 11:

Elaborate the ABC component of attitude.

Answer 11:

The emotional component of an attitude is that the affective aspect, the behavioural component is that the tendency to act while the cognitive component is that the thought component of an attitude. For instance, the cognitive component of prejudice, i.e., stereotype is in the middle of dislike or hatred, the affective component which can get translated into discrimination, the behavioural component.

Question 12:

What are the characteristics of pro-social behaviour?

Answer 12:

The characteristics of pro-social behavior are

- Aim to learn or benefit to others without expecting anything reciprocally.
- Helping others without expecting anything reciprocally.
- To willingly benefit others with none quite pressure.
- Provide help with none difficulty or any cost.
