- 1. The educational system creates these groups and contributes to being the main problem. Schools act like a social filter, if students feel that the system pushes them into a group of conformist individuals who conform to the most popular, dominant line. This heterogeneity can often have subtypes, but the school creates the basic heterogeneity. Educational institutions have different types of students, but students feel that they have to conform to different groups. Educational institutions, the government and culture are the main social forces that create subtypes in society, as students' learning shows.
- 2. The educational system has gathered together organized groups. History and geography, school subjects, history and politics, science, literature, math, etc. characterize groups, ideas and common goals. There are groups that have their own goals, interests and activities, and a specific group culture that can be observed, and can influence the learning process.
- 3. Promote a review of these social groups in society. Polyvalence in these groups, homogeneity in some areas, heterogeneity in others, and the same heterogeneity in the same group. Groups of people, groups of students, with similar interests and common goals.
- 4. Educational groups are not homogeneous. Some students are more interested in one educational area, others are more interested in another, and some students are interested in both.
