

CHAPTER IV THE DRIVER

Any driving situation involves three basic elements: the environment (the highway and traffic), your vehicle, and the driver—(you). Of these three elements, only you as a driver have the ability to gather information about the existing situation; apply your skill, knowledge, experience and judgment; and take the action required to safely complete the driving task. While good judgment can help to compensate for lower levels of skill, knowledge or experience, poor judgment can nullify any degree of expertness in these areas. Your judgment is primarily influenced by your attitude when you drive.

EMOTIONAL ASPECTS OF DRIVING

If you are worried, distracted, or if your mind is preoccupied, you cannot count on being sufficiently alert to drive safely. Troubles from home, quarrels, misunderstandings, financial worries, serious illness in the family, personal fears, or overconfidence can make you temporarily accident-prone. Strong emotions can work the same way. Persons who have just had violent arguments, or who are angry or in grief, need some time for "cooling off" or for making an adjustment before they drive a car. Taking out your frustrations or anger while driving on the streets or highways is exercising very poor judgment and can prove to be an expensive way to expend emotions. Worry and safe driving do not mix. If worried, ill, nervous, frightened, angry or depressed, let someone else drive.

As a well-adjusted person, you are more likely to be a good driver. You must always act not merely from your personal point of view, but with consideration and courtesy to other users of the streets and highways.

Remember, each person possesses a certain amount of power when behind the wheel, because full control of the vehicle is in the hands of the driver. Your attitude at the time you get behind the wheel and the use of this power tends to reveal the type of individual you are. Are you a bully, a thoughtless lawbreaker, a self-centered lane stealer? Are you a reliable, courteous, psychologically and emotionally mature person, prepared to share the road in the interest of traffic safety?

MEDICAL ASPECTS OF DRIVING

Your physical condition is an important factor in determining your ability to drive safely.
