The Sahara sets a standard for dry land, it's the World's largest desert. Relative humidity can drop into the low single digits. There are places where it rains only about once a century. There are people who reach the end of their lives without ever seeing water come from the sky. Yet beneath the Sahara is vast aquifers of fresh water, enough liquid to fill a small sea. It is fossil water, a treasure laid down in prehistoric times, some of it possibly a million years old. Just years ago, the Sahara was quite a different place, it was green.

Prehistoric rock art in the Sahara shows something surprising, hippopotamuses who need water year round. We don't have much evidence of a tropical paradise out there, but we had something perfectly livable, says Jennifer Smith, a geologist at Washington University in St. Louis. At times when the Northern Hemisphere tilts sharply towards the sun and the planet makes its closest approach, the increased blast of sunlight during the North's summer months can cause the African monsoon which currently occurs between the Equator and roughly 17° North latitude, to shift to the North as it did 10000 years ago, inundating North Africa.

Around 5000 years ago, the monsoon shifted dramatically southward again. The prehistoric inhabitants of the Sahara discovered that their relatively green surroundings were undergoing something worse than a drought and perhaps they migrated towards the Nile Valley, where Egyptian culture began to flourish at around the same time.
