

Police Studies 1000

Patrol, General Duty, and Investigative Policing

Upon completion of this unit, the student will be able to:

1. identify the varying roles and responsibilities of patrol officers including the realities of limited police resources on patrol units.
2. explain the ways police officers may use discretion when dealing with incidences and the factors that affect their use of discretion
3. describe the complexities and various roles involved in criminal investigations
4. recognize the effects of popular crime shows, such as CSI, on the investigative process

Patrol Officers and Their Duties

A large part of police work, and perhaps that of most importance, is the ability of police to interact with citizens on a regular basis while on duty. These interactions, while often associated with traditional law enforcement, also include positive relationship building with community members as well as administering social services. In this way, the role of the patrol officer is various and involves a number of responsibilities and duties.

These may include (but are certainly not limited to):

- a. the duty to protect lives and property
- b. apprehend persons suspected or know to have committed a criminal offense
- c. preserve the peace
- d. prevent crime
- e. enforce laws

Further, each of these responsibilities may be associated with any number of environmental and contextual factors that make patrol policing complex and multifaceted.

During patrol, officers are required to negotiate these factors and their relationships and interactions with citizens through both allocated and unallocated patrol time.
