

The Argumentative Essay

A good argumentative essay includes three basic components: an introduction (beginning), a body that develops your claims (middle) and a conclusion (end). All three are crucial in the successful construction of a strong and clear paper. It might be useful to think of the essay as being similar to the process that lawyers employ to make their "case" (introductory statements, evidence and closing remarks). If we extend this metaphor further, you can then think of me as the judge or jury who will decide whether your argument is convincing enough.

I. Introduction

This is the first part of your paper—it is the portion of the essay that introduces a number of elements to your reader: your topic, the works being used or consulted and, most importantly, your opinion (or argument or thesis statement in relation to the topic). The introduction should be more than a few sentences, but not more than a paragraph in length, and should establish the focus, scope and purpose of your entire paper.

The Thesis Statement (keep it clear and concise):

If the essay topic asks a direct question, then your thesis statement will simply be a brief and direct answer to that question, along with an indication of some of the examples that you will appeal to for support throughout the rest of your essay. Sometimes, the essay topics that I provide will not be in the form of a direct question, but may ask you to take a side, to explore some issues surrounding a topic, or to compare certain texts. In these cases, your introduction will clearly define the means and ends of your particular approach to the topic. Do not just aimlessly compare or explore examples, define a purpose or argument that justifies your appeal to these examples.

- A thesis states an opinion or argument. If you do not have a thesis (or opinion), then you are not writing an argumentative essay.
- A thesis should exemplify conviction, pertinence and precision. The more specific the wording of the thesis, the better the thesis. Think of it as a miniature "road map" of the essay itself that tells your reader where you are going and what route you are going to take to get there.
