Set the ignition timing.

If a scope or a dwell meter is used to adjust new points, be sure the points are in proper alignment. Also, set the contact dwell to the low setting. New points must be set to the low dwell as the rubbing block will wear down slightly while seating to the cam.

To check and adjust the breaker points with a scope, refer to "Ignition System Tests".

To check and adjust the breaker points with a dwell meter, refer to "Distributor Tests."

SPRING TENSION ADJUSTMENT

Correct breaker point spring tension is essential to proper engine operation and normal breaker point life. If the spring tension is too great, rapid wear of the breaker arm rubbing block will result, causing the breaker point gap to close up and retard the spark timing. If the spring tension is too weak, the breaker arm will flutter at high engine rpm resulting in an engine miss.

To check the spring tension on either the pivot-type or the pivotless breaker points, place the hooked end of the spring tension gauge over the movable breaker point. Pull the gauge at a right angle (90°) to the movable arm until the breaker points just start to open (Fig. 23). If the tension is not within specifications, adjust the spring tension on the pivot-type points or replace the breaker point assembly on the pivotless points.

To adjust the spring tension (Fig. 24).

1. Disconnect the primary or distributor-transistor lead wire and the condenser lead (if so equipped) at the breaker point assembly primary terminal.

2. Loosen the nut holding the spring in position. Move the spring toward the breaker arm pivot to decrease tension and in the opposite direction to increase tension.

3. Tighten the lock nut, then check spring tension. Repeat the adjustment until the specified spring tension is obtained.

4. Install the primary or distributor-transistor lead wire and the condenser lead (if so equipped) with the lockwasher and tighten the nut securely.

IGNITION TIMING

TIMING MARK LOCATIONS

The crankshaft damper (Fig. 25) has 15 timing marks ranging from top dead center (TDC) to 30° before top dead center (BTDC).

Refer to the specifications (Part 9-3) for the correct ignition timing.

ADJUSTMENT

The procedure for adjusting the ignition timing is covered under "Ignition System Tests."
