Mathematical modelling of systems (other than control) is commonly the subject of specific research programmes, laboratory, or computer-based studies with particular emphasis, and these programmes need to be carefully planned. Details of such a process are outlined in what to do when authors regarding a particular project are asked to prepare a proposal, offering a complete overview of the process of developing a research strategy. Although different departments, the processes, objectives, and results are fundamentally the same throughout. Furthermore, practitioners (engineers who increasingly understand all sorts of "new" means of information) need to learn to use such tools as mathematical modelling tools. Furthermore, the author strongly encourages people to use all available tools (mathematical models).
