These results encourage researchers to use environmental measures to monitor water quality rather than relying on chemical analyses. Other research suggests that chemical methods based on environmental parameters are difficult to implement because of the complex nature of rivers. Many parameters are potential indicators of water quality, although the number of parameters used in monitoring is often limited by the cost of analysis. The cost of analysis is often the limiting factor in water quality monitoring, and this may be the reason why many environmental measures have not been adopted. The results of this study suggest that more attention should be given to environmental measures and their use in water quality monitoring. However, the results of this study also suggest that the use of environmental measures in water quality monitoring is not always the best method. This may be due to the fact that environmental measures are often less accurate than chemical methods, and they may not be able to detect all types of pollutants. Therefore, it is important to use a combination of environmental and chemical methods to monitor water quality.
