These data have been interpreted as suggesting that early self-reflective thinking was a developmental process associated with the ability to think personally about others. Thus, the data further suggest that children's development of social thought (that is, thought about other individuals) and "metacognitive thinking" are distinct capacities that, although they are interrelated, cannot be viewed as the same process. It is important to note that although the data suggest that children's social thought and metacognitive thinking are distinct capacities, they are not mutually exclusive.

"Psychologists used to be the only people who thought about the mind, but now everyone's talking about it. It's a good thing, because it's a very important part of who we are. It's the part that makes us human. It's the part that makes us think, feel, and act. It's the part that makes us who we are. It's the part that makes us special. It's the part that makes us unique. It's the part that makes us beautiful. It's the part that makes us amazing. It's the part that makes us incredible. It's the part that makes us extraordinary. It's the part that makes us the best of all that is." — Dr. Sigmund Freud
