Organisations and governments are both institutions, governments are more centralised and controlling, organisations are more independent and have more power to make their own decisions and operate independently. Groups and associations like businesses are considered to be organisations because they are separate from governments, independent organisations produce their own products, and are separate from governments in their actions and responsibilities.

These three similarities are also known as features that distinguish them from other organisations. These similarities are as follows:

- Knowledgeable people are present there, these people are considered to be professionals in their field.
- The workers are specialised and trained to perform their specific roles.
- The workers are accountable for their work to their superiors and their customers.
- Different organisations compete with each other to gain more customers and more profit.

Organisations and governments organisations have the same characteristics as listed in feature 1, - controllability, these organisations have a specific aim, they are controlled by their superiors. These are the main differences between the two organisations. The main difference is that governments have more power than organisations. The organisations have a limited power and certain responsibilities, while governments have more power and certain responsibilities.

The main differences are as follows:

- Government organisations have authority over the people while business organisations do not have authority over the people they employ. Business organisations have professionals who are not controlled by their superiors.
