

FIG 1 – Sublevel cave (showing caving of the overlying strata) versus sublevel shrinkage with continuous fill (caving of the overlying strata is minimised).

FIG 2 – A cross-section through a drawpoint, showing a charge pad against the base of the rill.

1. a program to implement pre-charging
2. improving the charge pad construction.

Pre-charging

Pre-charging one to three rings in advance of the ring to be fired, enables the majority of charging-related work to be completed from a work basket rather than on the rill. This practice requires appropriate risk management processes to effectively manage the hazards associated with working and using mobile equipment under charged rings. It has been successfully implemented in a number of SLC operations, including the Ridgeway Gold Mine in New South Wales (Wiggin, Trost and Macaulay, 2005). The presence of 'reactive ground' in the Mt Wright orebody resulted in strict sleep time conditions for the use of explosives, which initially made pre-charging at Mt Wright operationally challenging. Reactive ground is defined as rock that undergoes a spontaneous exothermic reaction after it comes into contact with nitrates (Australian Explosives Industry Safety Group, 2012).

The presence of reactive ground and subsequent sleep-time restrictions at Mt Wright was known for some time prior to the implementation of SLS. It was found at that time that the oxidation of the ore was limited to an annulus around the circumference of the blastholes. Elevated temperatures (ground temperatures above 55°C) were only identified following the completion of The Bell and the establishment of the Main Production Zone in 800 Level (Figure 3). The heat source was found to be from the large mass of broken ground oxidising above the active production front. Any production holes that were connected to the broken ground above (either by a drilling breakthrough or broken ground) resulted in hot air being drawn down the production holes due to the negative pressure ventilation system. Eliminating the air pathway by blocking the hole below the breakthrough connection would quickly lower the temperature in the hole to the background rock temperature.

A series of ongoing test work (both in the explosives supplier's laboratory and at Mt Wright) was implemented to test the effectiveness of the inhibited explosives at a range of temperatures with the aim of extending the sleep time to allow pre-charging to take place. It was accepted that the drawpoint turnover rate and the presence of hot and reactive ground would restrict pre-charging to one ring only. It was envisaged that ten to 14 days sleep time would be needed to remain within the sleep time limits while allowing for operational delays to make pre-charging viable and effective. An operational trial of pre-charging was completed in a small area when seven days of sleep time was approved. This trial proved effective; however, the scheduling impacts of the sleep time limitations reinforced the need for ten to 14 days sleep time.

The ongoing testing program identified some samples ahead of the active production front that had a minor reaction (temperature rise of approximately 6°C) with the inhibited explosives at very high background temperatures (80°C). This resulted in a significant reduction in allowable sleep times while the testing program was revisited to ensure the outcomes were reliable at the full range of background temperatures. These restrictions resulted in suspension of the pre-charging
